Queer Past, Queer Future. From Identity Politics to Reconceptualizing a Queer Community

Theoretical tensions within queer theory stem from a critically founded suspicion towards the concept of identity underpinning representational politics, and its inability to completely disavow these identity categories. On the one hand, identity categories based on culturally marginalized sexualities understand themselves as autonomous and self-defining, but reproduce a logic of normalization in designating their own borders. On the other hand, the rejection of identity categories leaves the possibility of queer political action without a solid base. Through reading examples of antirelational and antisocial queer thought against multidimensional approaches of queer temporality that connect everyday praxis, political action and artistic expression, this paper explores the possible causes effects of this theoretical impasse and the ways in which a critical re-engagement with the queer past can offer a way of rethinking a future-oriented queer political project.
